Universal Hall

Located in Berlin's largest park, the 'Universal Hall' is an event venue that well and truly earns its name with a flexibility that makes practically any kind of gathering possible. Adjacent the Gotzkowsky Bridge, its Wilhelminian style red brickwork has been one of Moabit's most distinctive landmarks since its completion in 1890. Today, the former pumping station in the Tiergarten has traded its industrial purpose to become a top-notch venue for all kinds of gatherings and cultural events. The old machine room and the space adjoining it were completely gutted, remodelled and modernised to accommodate a diverse range of usage possibilities. The main hall was tiled with Italian stone and fitted with state-of-the-art entertainment equipment for customised lighting and sound.
